

Meet the 2026 Moonflower Co-op Board of Director Candidates

Everett Hildenbrandt

Everett Hildenbrandt moved to Moab full-time in 2020 after years of visiting for the outdoor adventures. Prior to living in Moab, he was involved in housing co-ops when living back in central Illinois, and is passionate about the resilience and sustainability aspect of cooperatives in all parts of our lives. Since shopping exclusively at Moonflower, he's noticed a marked improvement in his health and wellbeing, and is excited to help support the mission of increasing people's access to healthy food.

Brook Indries

I have been a committed advocate for organic agriculture since learning about the Green Revolution during my first year of college in 2002. Since then, I have worked as an organic farmer, regenerative beekeeper, landscaper, and Organic Certification Specialist, helping farms and handlers achieve USDA organic certification.

My passion for organic agriculture has expanded into permaculture, regenerative beekeeping, medicinal mushroom cultivation, food security, green building, bodywork, yoga, and growing nutrient-dense food. I am continually researching, experimenting, and refining sustainable practices that improve soil, food quality, and ecological health while helping people live more lightly on the planet.

Through my work, I have developed a strong understanding of the USDA National Organic Program standards and have been an active co-op member and volunteer in many of the communities where I've lived. I would be honored to continue serving on the Board of Directors to deepen my understanding of cooperative governance while contributing to the Moonflower Co-op's current success and helping shape its long-term vision, including the development of its future location.

Stacy Marple

Stacy came to Moab for the mountain biking — and stayed for the library. (Yes, she's the sticker.) What started as a series of visits turned into a life here, and she counts herself endlessly fortunate to have landed in this community.

By day, Stacy is a researcher with years of experience directing large-scale evaluation projects and providing technical assistance to schools, districts, and states; work that has sharpened her skills in financial oversight, strategic planning, and organizational governance — skills she's excited to bring to Moonflower's Board.

By every other hour of the day, she's probably outside: climbing, biking, packrafting, skinning up something snowy in the winter, or back to her old love of trail running. Her newest project is the hardest one yet — gardening in the desert, in the shade of two giant trees that seem to have their own opinions about what should grow here. Progress is slow. Opinions remain strong.

Stacy is honored to be considered for the Board and looks forward to helping support a co-op that has meant so much to her since the day she arrived.
